Background and Rationale	Due to existing socio-economic conditions, cultural beliefs and traditional practices, women and girls are more likely to be disproportionately affected by disasters, including increased loss of livelihoods, gender-based violence, and even levels of mortality during, and in the aftermath of, disasters. In the 1991 cyclones in Bangladesh, some 90% of those who died were women. When Cyclone Nargis hit Myanmar in 2006, the death rate among adult women was double that of men. More women than men were killed by Ebola because they were the ones who washed and prepared the bodies of those who died from the disease for burial, thereby exposing themselves to infection. Also, at the 2004 Indian Ocean Tsunami, women and children made up 77% of the victims in Indonesia. Women are often the drivers, strong networkers, managers, organizers, and caretakers in the community, playing a constructive and productive role in disaster risk reduction. There are plenty of success stories of women’s achievements in reducing disaster risk and in building resilience at the community level. Yet, still today, women tend to be categorized as “victims” and as a “vulnerable group” in need of protection from the impact of disasters, failing to recognize women’s capacities and contribution to disaster risk reduction and to promote their leadership, and role as change agents In building community resilience to disasters. The Sendai Framework for Disaster Risk Reduction, the 2030 Agenda for

Global Platform for Disaster Risk Reduction

22-26 May 2017 - Cancun, Mexico

Sustainable Development and the Paris Agreement include the common objective of reaching gender equality and parity by 2030 whilst building coherent approaches between sustainable development, climate change adaptation and disaster risk reduction.

Specifically, the Sendai Framework for Disaster Risk Reduction 2015-2030 emphasizes that “women and their participation are critical to effectively managing disaster risk and designing, resourcing and implementing gender-sensitive disaster risk reduction policies, plans and programmes; and adequate capacity building measures need to be taken to empower women for preparedness as well as build their capacity for alternate livelihood means in post-disaster situations.”

Alongside these international frameworks, in 2016 the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) has developed General Recommendations on “Gender-related dimensions of Disaster Risk Reduction in a Changing Climate”. The General Recommendations provide guidance to States parties to promote and protect human rights of women at all stages of disaster prevention, preparedness, response, recovery and adaptation.

The 2016 Regional Platforms for Disaster Risk Reduction have reconfirmed gender equality and women’s empowerment and leadership at the core of disaster risk reduction efforts to achieve the Sendai Framework targets and Sustainable Development Goals by 2030. They have highlighted the importance to develop gender-sensitive risk management national policies and plans; set aside dedicated budgets; create plans that provide adequate capacity building and that fully recognize woman’s existing capabilities and roles; collect sex-disaggregated data; ensure that women can access social protection and insurance, and promote and mobilize women’s leadership and gender equality.

Rationale

Governments and partners are in the initial phase of developing strategic framework and plans of action at the national and local levels to reach the Sendai Framework Target E (2020).

The 2017 Global Platform represents a critical time and unique opportunity to provide policy and implementation guidance to Governments to facilitate gender integration as part of national and local disaster risk reduction policies and plans by 2020, and to secure their commitments towards enhanced and sustained efforts in
